
INSPECTOR ANDREW BARRON

DECEMBER 2022

We have a number of personnel changes throughout the coming weeks with an officer due to transfer to the Mounted Branch and an officer transferring on acting promotion to Dunoon. Another officer is acting up to Sergeant rank from within the office and an officer from Campbeltown due to transfer to Helensburgh at the end of November.

Significant work is now underway with regard to the relaunch of the Police Scotland Youth Volunteer (PSYV) programme. This work is being led by our Youth Engagement Officer and is at the stage of recruiting youth volunteers and also crucially adult volunteers from within the local community who are vital to the operation of the scheme. Whilst the scheme is run and managed by the Police, many of the adult volunteers will be non police officers.

Work is also ongoing to implement the 'not at home' part of the 'Respect' programme in the Argyll and Bute area part of which is a shift change in terms of how the police and partners deal with and risk assess missing young people from looked after accommodation. This has been operating successfully in many other local authority areas throughout Scotland and will be a positive step in delivering for children at risk and ensuring that partnership and policing resources are not overburdened where simply not required. The overarching intent of this is to reduce harm for our care experienced young people in Argyll and Bute.

A major positive development within the area is the commencement of our newly established Community Policing Team which is a team of three officers who will develop local work in relation to community needs and problems as well as addressing the wider concerns around violence, drugs and anti-social behaviour. The team commenced work at the start of October and have already had a positive impact in the area.

A bespoke training programme set up by an officer from Helensburgh in conjunction with the National Park Rangers has resulted in several of the local officers being trained to work alongside the park rangers on the boat in the Loch. Not so critical as winter months approach however looking forward to the spring, having many more officers trained will provide that resilient, joint working that is required to police the Loch effectively.

A public facing campaign called 'Don't be that guy' in relation to promoting the safety of women and girls through positively influencing male behaviour has begun and is being broadcast nationally. Local officers have a part to play in the reinforcement of this through their daily work. This links in to the wider policing strategy dedicated to disrupting violence against women and local officers will be involved in the '16 days of action' which starts at the end of November.

COMMUNITY ENGAGEMENT TEAM WORK

Dementia Safeguarding Tag

During the summer of 2021, the Herbert Protocol was launched in Argyll and Bute. This involved promotion of the Herbert Protocol for every person living with dementia whether they are living at home, or within another setting in the event they go missing in order that Police Scotland can use the information on the form to find them sooner and therefore, safer. This work has been well received and continued to be promoted with both statutory and third sector services as well as featuring regularly on social media and other platforms.

Police Scotland are experiencing an increase in incidents pertaining to people living with dementia, who have been out in their community and have become distressed, confused or disorientated. Often this happens in cafes, retail outlets or on public transport. The normal response to this is that members of the public, normally those working in these premises, will engage with the person and try and lessen their distress. They will try and establish their name and an emergency contact. In most incidents, Police Scotland are contacted to assist as what we would class as a "concern for person" incident. Upon officers attendance, normally 2 officers in high visibility police uniform and a marked police car, they will try and establish their identity and of course, their wellbeing. Whilst officers will always be compassionate in their response, their very presence can often increase someone's distress, mainly owing to the uniform and police car.

The principal aim of the Dementia Safeguarding Tag is to provide everyone living with dementia, at least one Dementia Safeguarding Tag which can be attached to a handbag, mobile phone, walking aid, house keys, or item of clothing most worn. This would be for the person themselves or their family/support network to agree on based on the individual. The Dementia Safeguarding Tag looks like a keyring (around the size of a 2p coin) and contains what is known as Near Field Communication (NFC). NFC is the mechanism that enables chip and pin cards to work and can be operated by a mobile phone to use for payment means such as Apple Pay. Every modern mobile telephone has NFC technology within it, it simply needs to be enabled in the same way as Bluetooth or WIFI. This doesn't require an app and does not cost any money.

Each tag is individually programmed and when tapped against a mobile telephone populates a message relative to the wearer. Police Scotland have held a number of focus groups throughout Argyll and Bute involving people with lived experience of dementia. This has included those with their own diagnosis, those who have a family member living with dementia, or those providing support to people living with dementia. The focus groups have provided the design of the device itself as well as the wording to be contained when the device is tapped with a mobile phone. The focus groups have provided an overwhelming support of this project to be launched with 100% of those discussed saying this is a good idea and should be rolled out further. When tapped with a mobile phone, the tags will reveal the following:

My name is [insert name] and I live in [insert town].

I am living with dementia.
